The Right of Choice

Two of the men convicted of murder in connection with the Hochelaga Bank robbery at Montreal have started a "hunger strike." That is one strike that the public can afford to view with indifference. This is a free country, and even a murderer is entitled to refuse to eat if he wants to. If the whole gang at Bordeleau jail prefer to starve rather than hang they should be allowed to exercise their liberty in that respect without official interference or public protests. They would thereby save the country the cost of ropes and scaffolding. There should be no forceful feeding in their cases. It would be a misapplication of justice to force good food down the throats of such men. Better give it to the families of the men they murdered, and to their own dependents if they have any who were not in the conspiracy.

Fair Treatment for the National

The question of contracts for carrying mail is being taken up at Ottawa, and it appears from the despatches that the Canadian National has not been getting a fair share of that business. That is a matter that ought to be rectified. If the National system were under private ownership it would be only just that it should get an even break with its competitor in optional territory, and enjoy a monopoly of the business developing within its recognized sphere. The fact that the system belongs to the public, and that they have to pay its losses, is surely no reason why it should be dealt with less favorably. It is common and legitimate business practice for a company to make one of its enterprises play into the hands of another when that is possible. The Post Office Department should go as far in seeing that the Government railways get what is coming to it in the way of contracts for handling mails.

As a local illustration of the need of readjustment, it may be pointed out that the National does not carry between Edmonton and Vancouver, and between the latter and the other travel by way of Calgary. The National operates a through train daily from coast to coast. It makes the trip as quickly as the C.P.R. through trains. But it does not carry mail. That profitable traffic, originating in the territory served by the National system, is being handled by the C.P.R. because such as this are no doubt due to the terms of contracts made in the past and which have not yet expired. It is high time for a change, and the time to make it when new contracts are being let. The National is entitled to every opportunity that can be fairly given it, and unless that is done it is unreasonable to expect it to get up a self-sustaining basis.

A Way Out

Prayer King proposes a solution of the deadlock on church union that has the merit of being the only likely-looking alternative in sight. Parliament has to do something with the church union bill. If it passes the bill as originally drawn the dissidents will continue to dissent, and union will be only a term of derision. Parliament must therefore temper the bill to the point where it will protest. If it throws out the bill it will come back again next session. The members may as well make up their minds to take chances and deal with the question now.

If there was hope that in the interval since the last deadlock the other party's compromise would be arranged by the two parties to the controversy it was a vain one. When the bill came up on Tuesday there were charges of "treason" from one section of the house and of "disregard to the rights of the majority" from another section, and the bill was voted down. The bill was voted down and finally as they were two months ago. It is useless to leave it to the belligerents to make peace. Parliament will have to intervene in the role of pacifier, in one way or another, and whatever Parliament does, church union will be the result. An accomplished fact generally, while denominational organization will continue to be preserved in a large number of communities. Unanimity on a matter of the kind is hardly to be looked for.

The bill's proposal is that the bill be passed as it stands, but that Parliament shall declare its intention to be that the clauses shall become operative only in so far as it is within the power of Parliament to enact them. The effect would be—that instead of leaving the disputing factions to fight out in the courts the bill would be referred to a special committee.

Morey, of the Presbyterian General Assembly had power to negotiate the union—the Government would undertake to refer this point to the Supreme Court of Canada. Upon the decision of that tribunal hinge the outcome of the bill's failure in the form of union next June. It is probably too much to expect that this will meet with unanimous approval, or that it will not even be actively objected to in some quarter or other. But it appears to be the natural that Parliament can come to meeting the views of both unions and anti, and to give to both the assurance of full protection for legal rights.

Time to Lay Off

Ottawa must have been reading about the oil-smearing carnival at Washington. Parliament had a real old-time scandal session on Wednesday. In the House of Commons Mr. E. Gus Porter tried to get the members to decline to accept a bill that James Garfield had done something deplorable in the house of parliament in withdrawing his money from the Home Bank when he learned from street rumors that the institution was foundering. A committee had probed the affair and brought in a report that the charges had been greatly exaggerated. Evidence was given to show that Mr. Garfield had not obtained the information as to the bank's condition in any official way, and that he acted only as other alarmed depositors acted at the same time and on the same kind of information. The committee had voted to accept the report before the committee and the whole story of the transaction. He had also returned the money to the curator of the bank after the crash came, and thus put himself in the same position as any private citizen who had made a deposit and had not got it in time. All that of course did not satisfy Mr. Porter that Mr. Garfield was guilty of criminal intent and misconduct. Nothing could convince the member for West Hastings of that when the person concerned was a political opponent. For party reasons the Conservative members voted to accept the report, and the committee in report declared that the charge had been sustained. The Liberals and the Progressives voted solidly that it had not been sustained. It is notable that in making the accusation Mr. Porter had been careful to so word it that he will not have to pay the penalty of a libel if he is proved wrong. He will therefore continue to hold his seat, and no doubt to launch similar attacks upon the characters of other ministers as occasion offers to do without endangering his own position and the indemnity that goes with it.

In the Senate on the same day the members of the Liberal party sat down with the allegation made some time ago by Senator Taylor of New Westminster against the management of the National Railways in British Columbia. The substance of the Senator's charge is that head officials of the railways and their agents in the Pacific provinces are both dishonest and inefficient. These claims were investigated, in detail by the winning counsel for the National directors, also a Conservative, and reported to be without any foundation whatsoever. His findings have been supported by resolutions passed at the annual general meeting of the shareholders representing the largest investment of capital in British Columbia, and whose business brings them in daily contact with the railways and shipping officials. Senator Taylor refuses to accept this mass of testimony. His demand is for an open inquiry. That would make public the findings of the inquiry, and a great deal of the Government's business in British Columbia. This information would be immensely valuable to the C.P.R. and no doubt be warmly welcomed by the management of that company. Senator Taylor may not be the embodiment of the Conservative party, but he is to be. Whatever his purpose, he is fighting the battle of that corporation, and in face of the disclosed facts it is difficult to associate any other motive with his course of conduct; unless it be the constitutional disability of independent politicians.

But the Conservative's right to stop short of trying to injure a great public enterprise in hope of attaching odium to the Government that happens to be in power.

If Parliament has got to the place where it can find nothing better than scandal-mongering at which to employ, it had better take another precedent from Congress at Washington, wind up the remaining business on the program, and go home.

JUST SO.

The introduction at Ottawa of a bill to provide a standard quality for platinum goods in Canada is a good move. Persons who are contemplating the purchase of kitchen utensils, tools, golf clubs and other useful articles made of this durable and handsome metal.

"CAPITALISM" IN RUSSIA.

New York Times
The introduction of the inability (in Russia) of large-scale industry to supply even the pitifully restricted wants of the peasantry there has come a rapid growth of manual industry. One of the principal concerns of the Soviet Government today is this problem of the new "capitalist" artisans whose prices compete with those of the peasants. The advantages of the machine against the hand-worker are nullified by the inefficiency of bureaucratic management. Russian communism in its war against capitalism finds itself constantly confronted with new "capitalism" of the peasant, of the trader or Neeman, and of the handicraftsman.

FINE SCRUPLES.

Los Angeles Times
Just 100 years ago a gentleman sacrificed 2,000 English guineas to his fine scruples.

Lord Byron, the famous poet, presented his manuscript to the British Government. Upon his death it was found that this valuable unpublished manuscript had been bequeathed to his friend Tom Moore, and arrangement had been made by Moore by whom Moore was to receive 2,000 guineas for the manuscript.

Moore, Byron's brother, had scruples. He felt that if the book was published, relatives of the deceased relatives of those relatives, incriminate might embarras relatives of the poet still living. He consulted with Byron's sister, who disdained that publication. English newspapers of that date record that Tom Moore permitted the book to remain in his possession, and his heirs to retain it until June. It is probably too much to expect that this will meet with unanimous approval, or that it will not even be actively objected to in some quarter or other. But it appears to be the natural that Parliament can come to meeting the views of both unions and anti, and to give to both the assurance of full protection for legal rights.

In view of the numerous indistinct and sensational "memorials" that have flooded the literary market since the war, this example of scruples and consideration for the feelings of others seems quite forthcoming out of date. Still, just as a bit of serious psychology, it is interesting!

POSITION OF NEW POSTAL EMPLOYEES

Montreal, Friday, June 21.

Hon. Charles Stewart (acting postmaster general): The situation is clearing very rapidly. In Nova Scotia the strike is over. In Ontario, normally, there is no difficulty. The same is true of New Brunswick. In Quebec, however, the strike of private letter carriers is still on. Last night in two instances, the men were not fully manned. They are all now back on the job this morning, and Quebec is in a more promising condition. In Montreal a considerable number of the men are back on the job, and a great many strike. Their positions are being filled, and a great many of the employees, who are not out are coming back. Just before twelve o'clock there were 500 men trying to break into the post office, and the police in the West there has been no difficulty at all. In Hamilton the strike was settled yesterday about 120 men in turned out to duty this morning so that at the moment we are over-manned. In the case of the men who are not back on the job, there is no difficulty. There are still 500 men trying to break into the post office, and the police in the West there has been no difficulty at all. "POP" DAILY AND HIS FAMOUS CAR

Pop Daily's Golden Submarine, which he has entered in the championship speed battles which are slated to furnish the thrills on the opening day of the Edmonton Exhibition and Stampede, Monday evening, July 14, is the time set aside for the bogged-down space-eaters to line up their gasoline buggies before the starter's flag.

Daily is one of the veterans of dirt track racing and last year he had a Duesenberg on the local course. The fast company in which he has been thrown this year, however, forced him to get a faster mount, and he picked on Barney Oldfield's famous Golden Egg. This car is equipped with a Miller motor and it is said to be one of the fastest as well as one of the most famous cars in dirt track racing.

Daily will drive his Duesenberg in the light car events.

In spite of adverse weather conditions, and the fact that he had been away, he thoroughly enjoyed his holiday at the mountain resort, and had a number of long hikes. He proudly declared he had not been away.

The chief originally intended spending a week on his farm, and when he found the place overrun with caterpillars, and there was no place to remain there, he was not inclined to remain there.

The Peenies' Comics

THE WORLD'S SMALLEST PEOPLE.

BY W.M. DONAHUE.

The Lover twins had a lot of fun with their pet pinching bug, Fred. They taught him to pull their tiny wagon and they also taught him several pretty tricks. Fred was a good watch bug, too—even Mrs. Lover couldn't deny that, for he chased all ants and spiders away from the baby-shoe bungalow in which the Lovers lived. In spite of his good points, Mrs. Lover disliked Fred with a vengeance, for he would track up her clean floors now and then and sometimes he'd steal tempting bits of food.

Mrs. Lover threatened to chase the bug away if the twins didn't keep him out of the house. "I just won't stand for that nasty bug trackin' my floors up with his muddy feet, and if you don't keep him out of the house I'll run him off," she told the boys one morning after she had chased Fred out of the kitchen where he had upset a thimbleful of cookies.

Fred didn't mean to be bad—he just had to have something to do, and as long as he had the twins to play with he was a pretty good bug, but when the boys were in school Fred got terribly lonesome and he usually amused himself in ways that annoyed Mrs. Lover. One quiet afternoon Fred looked about for something to chew on, and, seeing Mrs. Lover's best caterpillar fur rug hanging on the clothes-line, he caught it in his strong pinchers and began to yank and pull with all his might.

In a short time Fred pulled the rug to the ground and then he had the time of his life shaking it. He growled and shook the rug so hard the noise attracted Mrs. Lover's attention, and when that little lady looked out the window and saw the bug shaking her best rug she flew into a violent rage. Catching up a broom she dashed out at Fred, who lost little time in racing up a blade of grass for protection. Mrs. Lover was thoroughly angry and she determined that Fred should go.

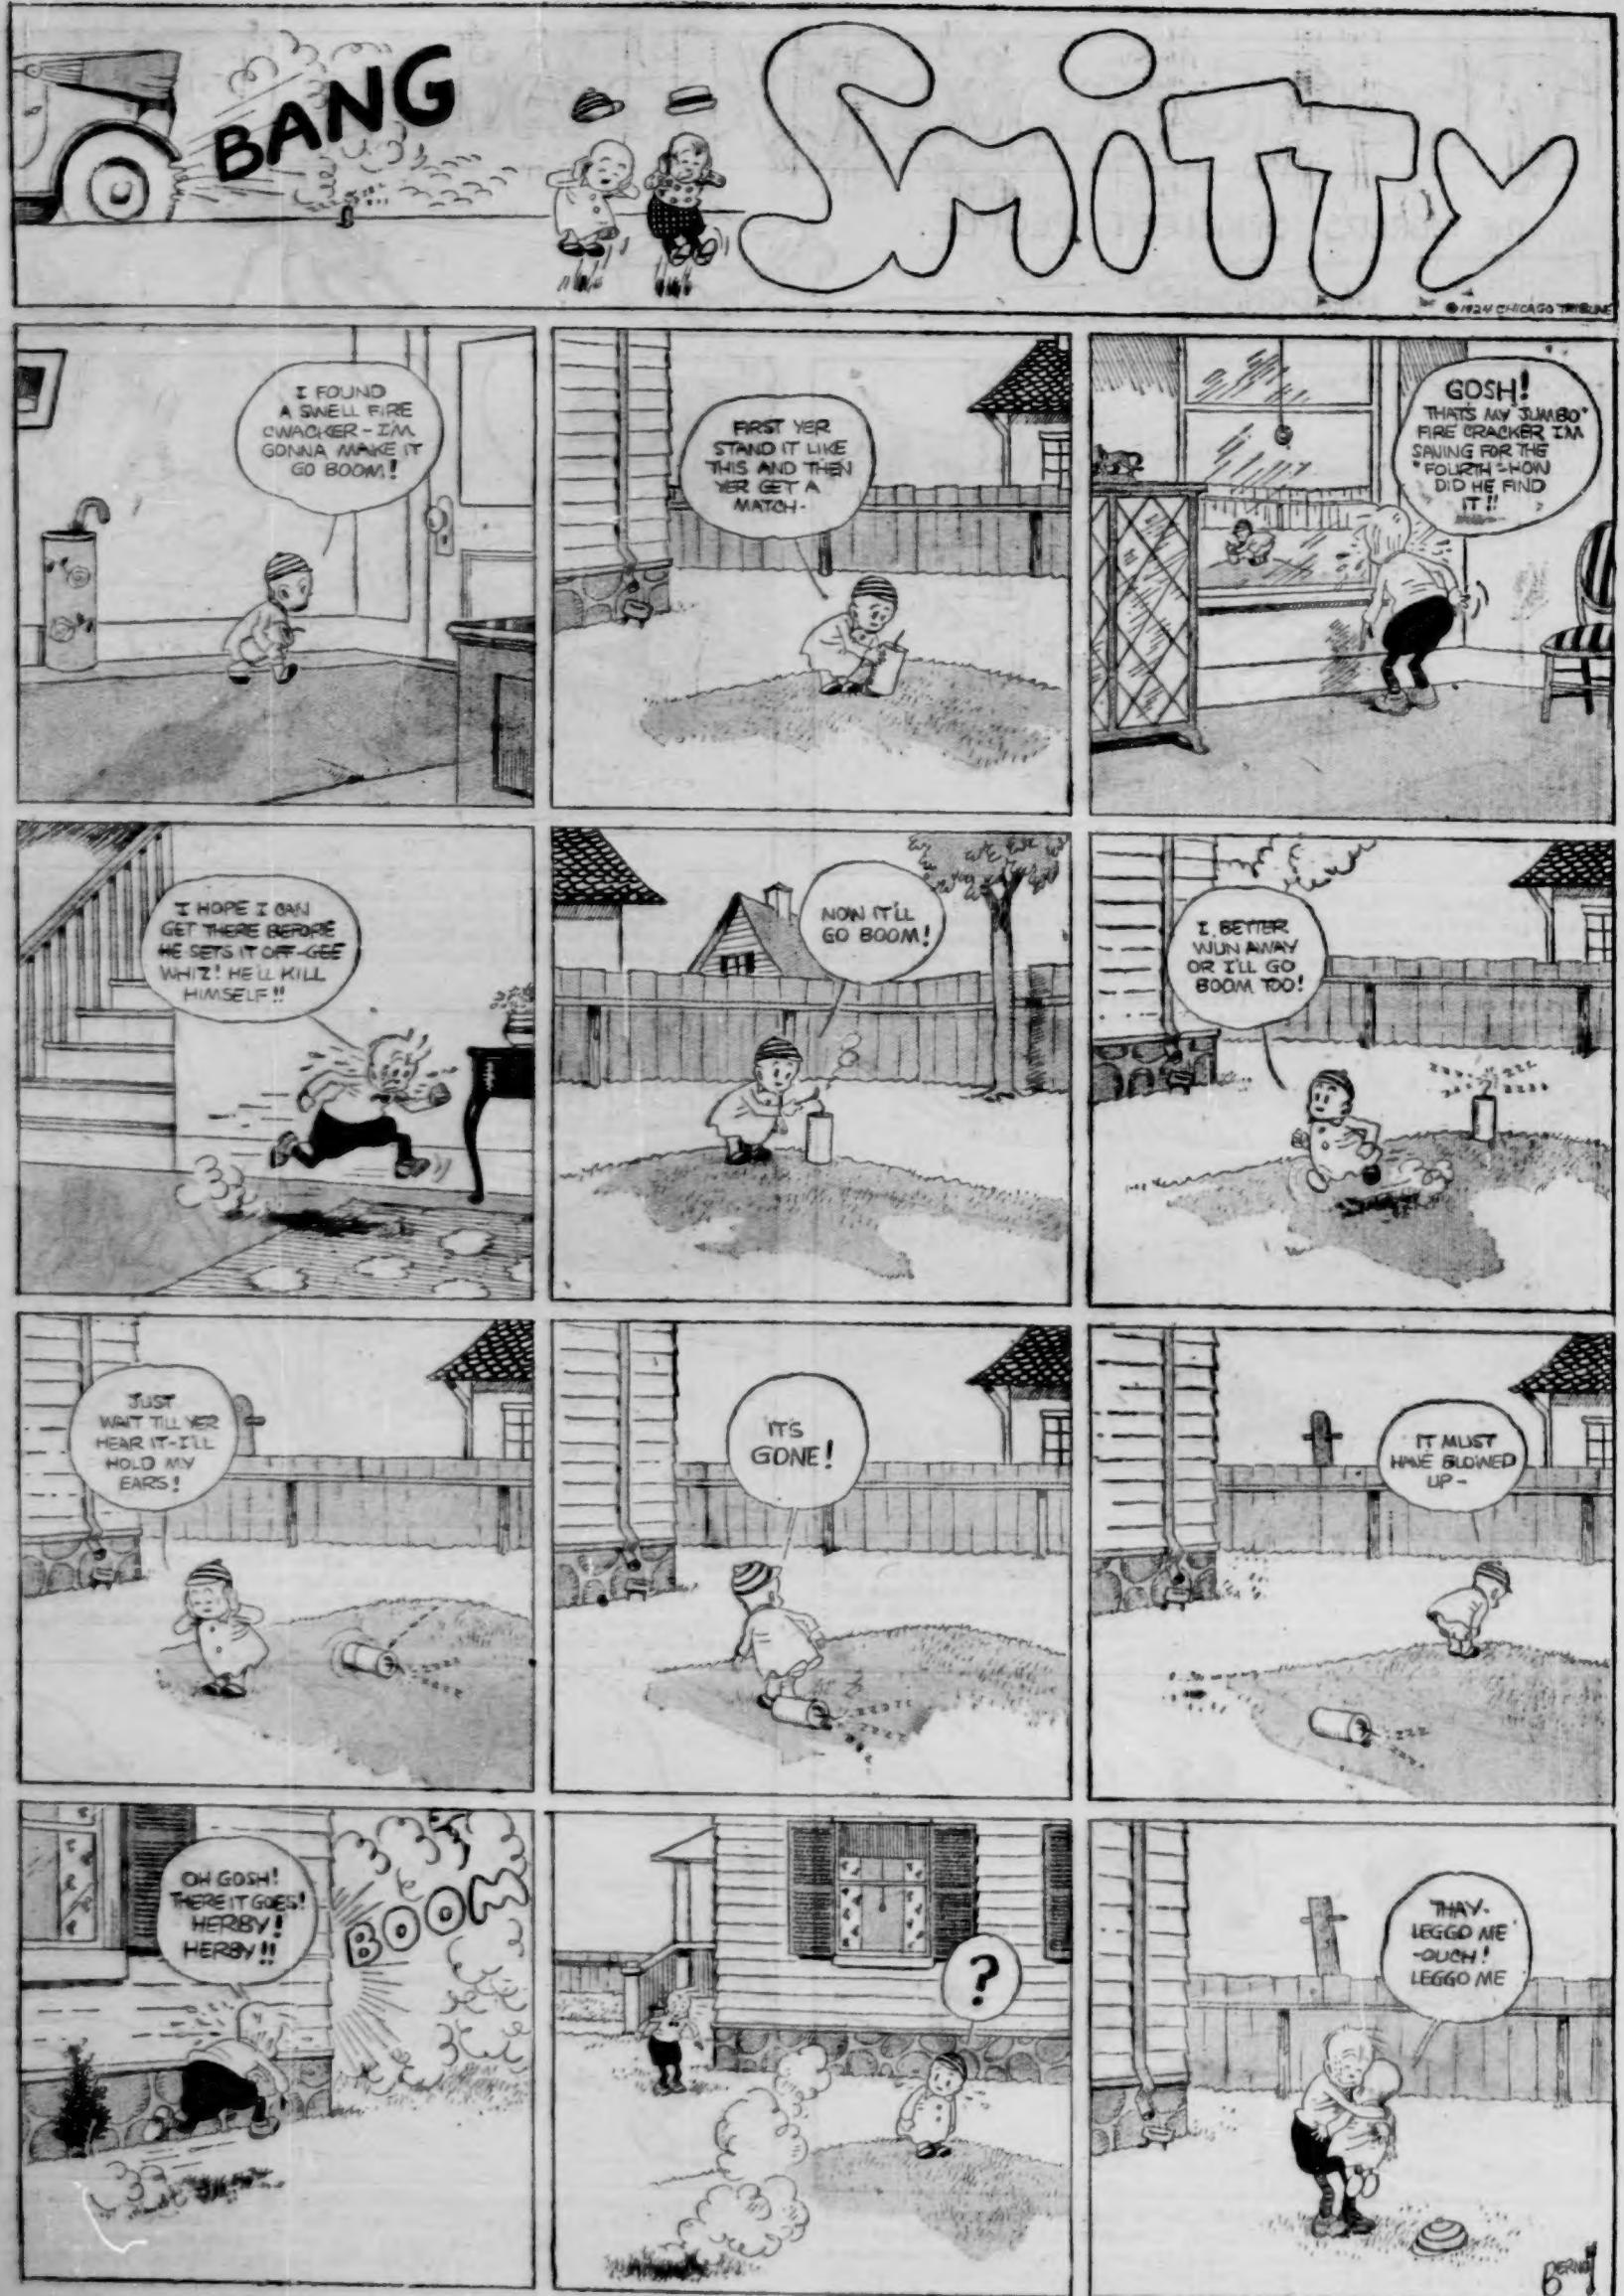

Poor Fred—he certainly was in disgrace, but he soon had an opportunity to show that he was really of some good to Mrs. Lover. Soon after Mrs. Lover had chased Fred up the blade of grass she had to go over to the shoe house to borrow half a peanut for a cake she intended to bake. On the way home she met a disreputable looking mouse who demanded the peanut. The poor little woman was scared half out of her wits, and there's no telling what would have happened if—

Fred hadn't seen the mouse make for Mrs. Lover. The bug uttered a low growl and, making a dash for the mouse, he caught it on the end of the tail and gave such a pinch the mouse jumped fully six inches into the air. He never stopped to see what had happened, but dashed off under the rose bush with Fred hanging to his tail. When the bug returned home he nearly fell over with surprise, for Mrs. Lover actually peered half invited him into the kitchen for some fresh cookies and sugar.
